Scenario: Improving competitiveness through new product development (NPD)

New product development (NPD) is a systematic way to evaluate ideas and transform them into new and successful products or services. It can help organisations to remain competitive within a marketing environment characterised by intense competition, shifting consumer behaviours and rapidly changing technology. NPD, if properly managed, can provide growth opportunities unmatched by existing products or services.

The Senior Management Team (SMT) has asked you to take responsibility for delivering a strategic marketing plan aimed at improving competitiveness through NPD. You are expected to begin with an in-depth audit of the organisation, which should evaluate the current approach to NPD. This work should be carried out for your own organisation or an organisation of your choice.

Following on from this, and using the outcomes of the audit, you are to prepare a strategic marketing plan for your chosen organisation, with the aim of improving competitiveness through NPD. It is expected that the plan would help the SMT to guide the creation of new or improved structures, collaborative and agile processes and practices that help to mitigate potential NPD failure and improve competitiveness.

Guidance notes:

Strategic audit

As part of the external audit, the candidate may consider current competitive performance by analysing market forces, current customers/consumers (in terms of strategic segments, their profitability, behaviours, demand assessment, satisfaction with existing products and/or services and with competing products and/or services), the competitor set – both direct and indirect – and strategic partnerships, as well as the role of stakeholders, advocates and other intermediaries.

The internal audit may contain analysis of organisational culture, resources and processes, particularly relating to NPD. It may also be helpful to consider other factors such as the competitive strength of existing products and/or services, competitor orientation, technology constraints, existing trade-offs between the benefits and risks of NPD, and the extent to which NPD currently supports competitiveness.

The SWOT/TOWS analysis should include a conclusion, with justification, as to how the current approach to NPD impacts the chosen organisation's competitiveness.

Objectives

The candidate should show a clear understanding of the role of the chosen organisation's vision/mission to support competitiveness through NPD, and recommend changes if needed.

Strategic options

These may include (but are not limited to) NPD strategies to improve the chosen organisation's competitiveness. In developing the strategic options, it could be helpful to consider the product and/or service opportunity and associated growth potential, the organisational fit and alignment to organisational priorities, and the required investment for the new product and/or service.

Strategic options should be justified in relation to how they might improve competitiveness.

Tactics

This section should cover all the tactical tools (the 7Ps of the marketing mix), plus any other relevant tactical tools for implementing the marketing plan to improve competitiveness through NPD.

Controls and measures

This section should include an analysis of the critical success factors that are key to controlling the implementation of the marketing plan. Measurements should include financial, resources and time-based measures.
